Self Introduction
Give a brief introduction about yourself.

I am Steffy, and my career goal is to provide employment opportunities to students from underdeveloped nations. I want to help NGOs around the world and help them become self-sufficient and independent.

In undergraduate school, I studied Psychology to study more about human nature and characteristics. For my graduation thesis, I researched non-profit organizations, particularly in South Africa, in terms of structural and psychological problems, and the forthcoming of a non-profit organization.

While in high school and university, I was very involved in NGO activities and took part in globally recognised campaigns. I worked for various organisations as a part-time volunteer.

After graduating, I worked for a multinational company as a counsellor to gain consulting skills. I acquired great experience in human development, sports, health, clinical, social behaviour and cognitive processes.

I was involved with many practical consultations along with activities related to establishing new NGO organizations and charity events. Besides these events, I also participated in an international mental health conference in Kenya. During the past years, I have been engaged in many social activities, working along with renowned social activists and gradually became more interested in practical exercises along with the psychological aspects of organisations.

The question arose "how to benefit these organisations with commitment and how to research further on human development and psychology".

Psychology is an exciting subject which helps me to gain a deeper understanding of what it means to be human and why people think and act as they do. How do they interact and change their behaviour over their lives? Studying Psychology also helps me to work in a variety of settings in both the public and private sectors and make a positive impact by often helping to treat people, working with NGOs around the world and undertaking vital research.
